"God's Call to Service and Leadership": a remarkable book for those who are in leadership and management positions who seek to learn further on effective governance. "God's Call to Service and Leadership" is the creation of published author, Rev. Daniel W. Farley, Ph.D., a retired United Methodist minister who has served as president for more than thirty-three years at GlenWood Park Inc., a United Methodist-related continuing care retirement community in southern West Virginia.

Rev Farley shares, "Effective organizations seeking to have a distinct presence in the growing years of the twenty-first century will need human genius to create emerging organizations to do their work. This means being led to achieve rather than being forced through desire. Due to the sophisticated nature and presence of today's workforce, management will likely find itself spending many hours in reading, research, and exploration in order to determine the best message and approach to influence factors of work life that impact employees. Boards must expect and leave to their CEO the task of setting the stage and enabling actors (personnel) to be motivated and to perform. The days are long gone for directing people as a boss and compelling them to work. CEOs who do not understand this fact will likely not survive, nor will they position their organizations to survive."

Published by Christian Faith Publishing, Rev. Daniel W. Farley, Ph.D.'s new book is an engaging work on how leaders should be sensitive to God and his commands, to other people's diverse plights and needs, and various circumstances in life—all "grand teachers" that guide them to become effective servant leaders.

He discusses what it truly means to be a servant leader in his brilliant book. Readers can pick many helpful life and career-related lessons in the things that Farley has shared.
